

Anne Weidman

Thu, Sep 17, 3:56 PM
(7 days ago)

to me

I'm jangled.

It is deeply troubling to know that if I should choose to question something I encounter that appears to be improper or unethical at the city level, my education, my intelligence and my personal social media posts could be taken into account to help to judge the veracity of my allegations about improper behavior.

This doesn't sound like America. To be honest, after watching Duncan McCallum last night, I would never be so bold as to call out unethical behavior if it crossed my path. Knowing that attacking the accuser is ok, even at this level, makes it a never-will-happen for me to step up and do the right thing, should I ever be in that situation. I would have to turn my back.

This sounds like the rape victim who has to defend her choice of clothing or her style of dancing instead of focusing on the crime. This board is not evaluating Nancy.